

It's called the Graduate Minnesota campaign. The Minnesota State Colleges and Universities system is pushing to get working adults who have earned some college credits to go back to school and complete their degrees. It features letters to more than 20 thousand people who recently attended a state college or university, but didn't earn a degree.

Mary Rothchild says many Minnesotans are closer than they think to earning a degree, which would make them more attractive to employers.