

If the DNR takes it over, will La Crosse be able to use its own marsh? The DNR wants the city to live up to a decade-old vow to transfer ownership of the marsh to the state agency. But some are worried that would mean La Crosse would have less control over land within city boundaries. Possibly, says the DNR's Craig Thompson, but possibly no less control than it has now

The transfer talk has emerged again after the resurgence of potential plans to build a north south corridor for the city through the marsh.