

Television news, and especially cable news, doesn't get much respect from audiences. And Soledad O'Brien can understand why. The long-time CNN news anchor now operates her own media company, where she can pursue stories which may not get attention from the major media outlets. O'Brien tells La Crosse reporters that there is good journalism being done, amid the political arguments that fill up air time:

\(Click for Audio\)

O'Brien spoke at U-W-La Crosse last night. She says there are many great news stories waiting to be covered by reporters who can take the time to 'dig in' to report them.