

They're meeting today for the first time.

Whether the La Crosse city council chicken rules committee will actually do anything when it meets is yet to be determined. Council member Marilyn Wigdahl's on the committee. She doesn't see making much immediate movement on refining rules for keeping chickens in backyards. Today's meeting, she says, won't be for much more than electing officers. Wigdahl has already very vocally stated her opposition to keeping chickens in town. Besides, she says, council members have much more important things to work on.
