

The legislative redistricting process in Wisconsin was bound to get a little contentious. Democrats were locked out of the process of redrawing political boundaries in the state completely during this last go 'round. The republican-controlled approach led to a federal court battle. There's a better way, says Jay Heck from Wisconsin Common Cause. Like in Iowa, where political districts are drawn up every ten years by a nonpartisan board

The groups who filed lawsuits regarding new redistricting maps claim they were done in such a way as to especially limit voting influence of blacks and latinos in the state.
