

(AP) Some of the Minnesota charities that operate pull-tabs and bingo games whose tax proceeds are being eyed to help pay for a new Vikings stadium believe the state's projections of how much money would be raised are too optimistic. The Vikings stadium bill would allow charities to offer new, electronic versions of their pull-tabs and bingo games. The hope is that increases gameplay, and creates a corresponding spike in tax revenue to finance the $400 million state share of a new, billion-dollar stadium in downtown Minneapolis. But some game operators are skeptical of the Dayton administration's projections. The CEO of the Hoffman Senior Citizens Club in that small western Minnesota town says she strongly doubts their gambling profits would more than triple in size, as the state estimates.
