

There's always somebody left a little unhappy at the end of a legislative session in Madison. No exception for the current one. Wisconsin lawmakers end their session today with many things they could have done, says Jay Heck from Wisconsin Common Cause, like creating disclosure rules for campaign spending and improving the redistricting process. Although, Heck says, he's not all that surprised they never got to those issues

Heck says the largest part of the failure of lawmakers to get traction on many issues is how divided the capitol remains.