

Plenty of safe places to work in the region. A meat-packing plant in Norwalk doesn't appear to be among them. OSHA has put the smackdown on the VPP Group meat packing facility for what the federal agency is calling a "zero commitment to worker safety and health." The action comes after the December electrocution death of a worker at the plant. OSHA says the worker was sent to work on a leaking water pipe near an electrical box. The fed agency found nearly a dozen violations in the plant, some not having anything to do with the electrocution. OSHA has recommended fines of nearly 190 thousand dollars to VPP.
