

No lack of problems around the state in the June 5th recall election.

The Wisconsin Election Protection commission's report on the election found widespread confusion about election law changes, as well as registration problems and misinformation from poll workers. Like in La Crosse, where the group says some election workers apparently incorrectly told college students returning home from the summer that they weren't allowed to vote in the election. The group also says redistricting caused confusing among voters about where they were supposed to vote.
