

A case just decided by the US supreme court has OWI attorney chatrooms everywhere buzzing. In Missouri vs McNeely, the court has determined that police can not necessarily draw blood from a drunk driving suspect without consent or a warrant. It's not a definitive ban on warrantless blood draws, says OWI attorney Todd Schroeder, from Devanie, Belzer and Schroeder in La Crosse, which may cause some confusion about when a warrant is actually needed

Currently, police will take your blood after an OWI arrest whether you want them to or not--no warrant required.
