

Add a democratic voice to those calling for an audit of the UW system. The system's been under fire for the last couple of weeks after a report found the system had nearly 650 million dollars in reserves, about 200 million of which had no particular spending designation. Mostly republicans have used the report as an opportunity to bash the system's operations. Now Alma state senator Kathleen Vinehout, a democrat, says the large cash reserves need to be investigated a little more thoroughly. But, at the same time, urges other more critical lawmakers to ease up on their criticism until such an audit can be completed.
