

Many people in the business world are angry at the White House and others in Washington for pushing new clean-air standards for power plants. Critics believe the rules will cost jobs in America, and give an advantage to other countries. The proposed rules for coal-fired plants could be rough on Wisconsin, and on companies like Dairyland Power, according to company V-P Brian Rude:

\(Click for Audio\)

Rude tells us that older Dairyland plants, such as the generator at Genoa, are fairly up to date already on technology to keep pollution out of the air.