

La Crosse police say they're studying an intersection in the city. But you get the feeling they already know what the study will say. Cops last week added a crossing guard at the intersection of Crowley and Losey boulevard after urging from some city council members. The plan: study the need for the guard at that intersection throughout the entire school year

La Crosse police captain Jason Melby. Actually, a recent study showed that less than one student per school crossing guard shift crossed the street at that very busy intersection.
