

Don't think that Chris Olson is going to give up on a new marijuana rule. The La Crosse city council member says he's going to push towards overturning the mayor's veto on an ordinance that would allow police to write tickets for simple pot possession. He says judges are behind the measure, doctors are behind it, public opinion seems to be solidly behind it. Olson says, if mayor Matt Harter's only concern about the ordinance is that the public get better educated about what it actually is, than an override should be achievable.
